

Dreams, subtitled "a visual mixtape", is a loosely autobiographical piece of expressionist theatre. Abstract, surreal, and told through sequences intertwining music and performance, its narrative arc centres around the core question of "how do you express yourself without words?" - something its main character struggles to come to terms with. By expressing herself, she learns to tap into the collective consciousness of all of those who dream, live, and feel.