PLAYWRIGHT/DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The audacity of bodies across the world defying the SIQ-Separate, Isolate, Quarantine mandate to take to the asphalt in solidarity with Black lives was staggering. Yet it was the image of Japanese protesters in Tokyo, chanting "Black Lives Matter" during the wake of the George Floyd protests, that stopped me in my tracks. That moment became the ignition point for Danse Macabre.

What is this cry: Black Lives Matter. What is the ideology beneath the phrase? At a time when the counter-cry of "All Lives Matter" attempted to dilute its urgency, I found myself questioning how deeply this movement was truly understood.

What better way to excavate this tension than through the Carnival.

Carnival has always been our mirror and our weapon. Through mas and calypso, we confront power, mock injustice, and speak the unspeakable. No! It's not just a big 'Parday' of tits and derrière, beads and feathers. In Danse Macabre, the costume becomes the site of truth-telling, resistance, memory and reckoning. This is the axis on which the play turns.

From the violent cultural amputation of Africa, the radical uprising of the Haitian Revolution, to the fire and defiance of the Canboulay Riots, Black bodies have always had to dance and fight their way into being.

The public execution of George Floyd forced the world to bear witness. It offered a moment of reckoning, but not resolution. Understandably, we are no longer where we were. However, we exist now on a perceived larger plantation with acres of awareness; where visibility does not equal freedom, and where the performance of justice is still under scrutiny.

Suffice it to say then, business as usual is no longer possible.

- Rhoma Akosua Spencer, MFA

PLAY SYNOPSIS

Danse Macabre follows Cisco, a queer Trini-Canadian Carnival costume designer whose uncompromising artistic vision drives her to create a mas rooted in the buried histories of the Black diaspora. However, it is being portrayed by a Trinidad French Creole descendant. What begins as a bold creative act becomes a spiritual and psychological unravelling, as the costume invokes ancestral memory—from the violent rupture of enslavement in Africa, through centuries of resistance, to the catalytic fire of the Haitian Revolution.

NOTE:

Keira Marie's portrayal of Frame is an embodiment of the costume being built. It is an extension of Cisco's imagination and her conscience. Inspired by the Egungun, an ancestral masquerade from the Yoruba nation. A living presence of the dead among the living.
